The most distressing results of the altogether aggravating epidemic of influenza come from the depression of spirits of its victims and the delirium which often attends it and which has caused no less than four sufferers to take their own lives within the sound of the sunset gun of Castle William.

In the face of this rosy view of the prevalent epidemic the Police Department has lost eight officers whose deaths were caused by pneumonia or other complications arising directly out of influenza, and the mortuary columns of the daily newspapers are full of deaths from diseases of this character.
